Following the clear results of the US election, the outlook for riskier assets has become more favourable. We are pleased to see growth outperform value in November once again.

Investors have been quick to reallocate from Europe to the US, reflecting conviction in the Trump administration's proclaimed pro-growth policies. Indeed, Europe is facing new geopolitical issues, and European companies are widely expected to face new US tariffs.

Generally, our European portfolios favour Europe's strongest companies. Their quality features such as clear competitive advantages, criticality in manufacturing, network effects, and long-term contracts all help lock in their above-market earnings growth. They are also typically global exporters, earning only around 40% of their revenues locally.

While the US is a key market for Europe, and much larger in this respect than China, we wish to highlight that only 6% of goods are exported. A lot of manufacturing capacity has been established in the US already. A beauty and cosmetics group is a great example, where an estimated 80% of beauty products sold in the US are manufactured locally.

Proposed lower taxes can unlock consumer spending on luxury goods, travel, and hotels, where our conviction names LVMH, another luxury goods company, and the aforementioned hotel group are positioned to benefit.

The US aside, recent data from China point to a macroeconomic stabilisation and even an upswing in the financial sector in that country. This is currently being overlooked, but the region could offer positive surprises in 2025 as stimulus eventually takes effect.

In terms of risks at this juncture, investors expect the central banks to cut their key interest rates considerably. However, that may not happen if inflation picks up again. Moreover, several geopolitical crises remain unresolved, and the second Trump administration may take decisions that have a negative impact on the world. With US import tariffs and trade conflicts looming, active management will be key for success in a global environment in which opportunities and risks are unevenly distributed.

Considering our growth portfolios, we believe when the current cyclical effects recede (in sectors like medtech, construction and semiconductors, even the consumer space), our stocks that are currently weak can recover quickly. In the US market, a broadening of stock performance could helpfully result from pockets of high valuations retracting, and artificial intelligence (AI) adoption increasing to create more winners. Lower rates and a more buoyant economy should bring support to our consumer names and overall, accelerate growth above value once again. We remain optimistic about the year ahead.
